HOMOEOPATHY GETS HEARING

Formerly we were ridiculed and opposed; to-day we have a hearing,' said Dr. C. E. Wheeler, of London, in his presidential address at Glasgow recently to the International Homoeopathic Congress., 'There is a chance in the medical world. The specialist is almost unmanageable, but the general practitioner remains a hopeful subject for our appeal. The form of that appeal must be twofold. They should present their data. In the light of other knowledge, they are required to present their clinical results in a form that took more heed of prejudice and scepticism and allowed for modern scientific handling of them. Doctors from 20 countries attended the Congress, says the 'Evening News.' (The principle of homoeopathy was evolved over a hundred years ago by Samuel Hahnemann, a German physician who believed that it was better to give a patient a small dose of a drug than a large dose.) ?
